'Let Us Become Known'

President Eric F. Spina urged this during his inauguration address, and more than 100 faculty, staff and students stepped up during the 2016-17 academic year to help share our accomplishments and expertise through some of the world's most visible media outlets.

"On campus, we are working hard to make a University of Dayton education affordable and accessible to all who are qualified and our campus more diverse from the boardroom to the student body. And we know our faculty and staff are developing excellent, new learning and teaching models that engage students, provide them with experiential learning opportunities, prepare them for servant-leadership roles, and enhance the dialogue between faith and reason, a centerpiece of Catholic intellectual tradition," Spina said. "But to be known, nationally and globally, we also need the collective efforts of our campus community to share our accomplishments and expertise."

Our faculty, staff and students helped affirm our growing academic and research reputation. They translated often-complex research into easy-to-understand terms, and helped communicate our Catholic, Marianist philosophy of education as well as our efforts to be a more affordable, diverse University.

Let's keep this momentum rolling; help us continue telling the University of Dayton story and spreading our reputation as a learning community striving to transform the world.
